Quest For Water - Tulare Irrigation District - Its History, People, and Progression

At last, after over five years of research, travel to historical archives housed in distant libraries, fact-checking and fact-checking one more time, and exhaustive professional editing, we are there! Richard Zack's manuscript of TID's history, starting with its formative years in the late 1880s up to current times, is now made ready for publishing in book form. It contains some 450 pages and is chock-full of many older photos heretofore unseen in any publication.

TID's story is a tale of water and all that is involved in securing its application in producing food for a growing nation. Maybe it's a small history in a little corner of the world. Histories of big achievements by notable people have been well-documented and read by many. Smaller histories are lesser known, but they are no less rich with insightful and noble people and their astounding accomplishments. This book represents but one recordation of a rich history out of one of those distant corners and serves as a tribute to the many individuals, past community leaders, ancestors, and citizens long forgotten who worked so hard and beat all odds to get the Tulare Irrigation District "on the map."

Tulare Irrigation District remains as the fourth public water district to form since the passage of California's Wright Act in 1887 and, for this and other reasons, its well told saga is worthy of a professional-grade publication. If you wish a copy of this rather unique book of water development titled "Quest for Water," please complete the order form on the back of this pamphlet.
